The Arctic Circuit

The Arctic Circuit is the most demanding of the three circuits, and the one that separates the competitors who have prepared from those who have merely hoped. It runs for seven days, covers more than 1,200 kilometres, and includes a mandatory overnight survival exercise in which each team must build its own shelter, source its own water, and navigate back to base without a compass.

The first two days are relatively straightforward. The terrain is flat, the weather is cold but manageable, and the checkpoints are close together. Most teams arrive at the first overnight stop in good spirits, with their vehicles intact and their crews in reasonable shape. The real difficulty begins on the third day, when the route leaves the road and enters the boreal forest.

Navigation and Survival

Navigation in the forest is unlike anything most competitors have experienced. There are no landmarks, no signposts, and no mobile phone signal. Teams must rely on a map, a compass, and their own judgement. The organisers deliberately withhold the exact location of the checkpoints until the morning of the third day, so that no team can plan its route in advance.

The survival exercise is the most memorable part of the circuit. Each team is dropped at a point 15 kilometres from base and must reach the finish line by the following afternoon. They are allowed to carry a tent, a sleeping bag, a stove, and enough food for one day. Everything else they must find or improvise. The temperature on the night of the exercise has been as low as minus 22 degrees Celsius.

> The Arctic Circuit does not reward the fastest driver. It rewards the team that stays together, keeps its head, and remembers to eat.

Scoring

Points are awarded for each checkpoint reached, for the overnight shelter, and for the finish. Penalties are applied for lost time, for damage to the vehicle, and for any member of the crew who requires medical attention. The team with the highest total at the end of the seven days is declared the winner.

Position	Points
1st	100
2nd	80
3rd	65
4th	50
5th	40
6th	30
7th	20
8th	10

Ties are broken by the time taken to reach the finish line. In the event of a further tie, the team with the fewest penalties is placed ahead.
